

Mrs. Bronson Howard Tells of the First "Henrietta"

Of the audience which witnessed the opening performance of William H. Crane and Douglas Fairbanks in "The New Henrietta" at the Knickerbocker Theatre on Monday night was Mrs. Bronson Howard, widow of the well known dramatist. Mrs. Howard was the hostess of a family party that included Bronson Howard Waterman, nephew of the writer. It was the first time Mrs. Howard has seen the comedy in its new form and the second time in nearly fifteen years that she had heard the familiar lines she had read over and over with her husband when his story was in its formative stage nearly thirty years ago.

"Strangely enough," remarked Mrs. Howard, "my mind went back beyond the opening of the original 'Henrietta.' As I thought the laughter and response to the spirit of the comedy my mind's eye held a picture of the dress rehearsal the night before the piece opened at the old Union Square Theatre in 1887. Mr. Howard had worked very hard upon the story and had reached that stage in the creative writer's work where one loses faith in it completely. It seemed to me the rehearsal was progressing splendidly, but Mr. Howard was nervous and slightly depressed and I could feel his mood. At this juncture Mr. Crane came over to where we were sitting. His face was beaming and patting Mr. Howard affectionately upon the back he said in his emphatic way:

"Bronson, we've got it sure."

"It was a convincing speech and sounded full of relief to me. I can assure you. Of course the following night fully confirmed Mr. Crane's optimistic estimate, and the subsequent history of the comedy is well enough known to bear it out."

Several offers have been made to Mrs. Howard to permit a revival of "The Henrietta" since Stuart Robson laid it aside, but she could never bring herself to consent to the plan. Last summer when Mr. Joseph Brooks proposed a revision of the comedy with Mr. Crane in it the proposal struck her favorably. Mr. Brooks had been intimately identified with one of its characters, so she felt sure that they would do full justice to the original.

"I wish to thank THE SUN," Mrs. Howard said, "for this opportunity of expressing my congratulations to Mr. Winchell Smith and Victor Mapes for their work in fitting the play to present day considerations. The changes they have made in the text and in the situations are judicious improvements."

"I may be a bit old fashioned in my notions regarding the drama, but I've always considered that the theatre was primarily a place of amusement. The unpleasant themes of many of our modern plays are distasteful to me. I think many playgoers will welcome a chance to see the good old illusions of real people in a series of comedy situations with a touch of pathos and the note of human appeal to heighten their effectiveness. I felt myself responding again to the story of this little family group and that fine audience on the opening night expressed to my understanding the same viewpoint."

"It was a splendid performance. Mr. Crane has mellowed and grown more unctuous in his characterization of old Nick. Mr. Fairbanks as Bertie was a new study to me. I liked it more than I can actually tell you. He does not suggest the late Mr. Robson to me in any sense. I think he was chosen wisely to make it a new and individual character study. I am deeply grateful to the producers, the revisionists and the players for their splendid handling of Mr. Howard's comedy."
